

The Einstein Posse

On the day one of his special education gifted students killed herself, Dr. Marc Thomas, the school psychologist, was quietly seething with anger as he listened to a teacher rant about a boys failures. A student breaking into the meeting says three words, she hung herself, and Marc is plunged into a world of school secrets and violence, a communitys long held secret about the girl, and his own demons. The first thought Marc Thomas had about his gifted student, Patsy Anderson, was he didnt have a clue why she would kill herself. His second thought was a question. How could he have totally missed any signs that she would do something like this? His third thought was all hell was going to break loose. That thought was not strong enough. In the Colorado mountain community of Rua Springs, a death at school hadnt occurred for so long that most people couldnt remember it. For school psychologist Marc Thomas, it only added to his ongoing grief about Lilly, his wife, who was killed by a drunk driver. Struggling to do his job, Marc also wants to know why Patsy hung herself and so his search begins. At the same time Marc is settling in with his dad and grandpa after moving back to his home town following Lillys death. Bret, Marcs dad, and Herman, Marcs gnome-like grandpa, plus Marc make for interesting adventures in the all-male home. The three males share a love that is built on mutual respect and trust forged through the death of all three of their wives. Each in his own way provides a bond to the others that is unbreakable. Although there are times that grandpa Hermans crazy, humorous acts, along with his friend, Charlie, make Bret and Marc want to strangle both of them. Marc's journey of discovery leads him into long discussions with his cousin, Katherine, a local Episcopal priest, about life, death and grief. Marc, along with his dad, grandpa, and childhood friend, Steve Montes, the county sheriff, are led to a secret group at school, The Einstein Posse, which is determined to provide justice to the bullies they believe may have pushed Patsy to end her life. Driven to find answers, Marc, is led to an old cabin, that is said to be haunted, and to the long dead Rua Springs silver mine where facing danger he finally discovers the answer to Patsy's past, a long-held secret of her parents, and friendships in a small community.
